Children still suffer because of cultural and traditional practices

OIJJ

In October 2012, the International NGO Council on Violence against Children released a report on harmful practices against children. A report "Violating children's rights: Harmful practices based on tradition, culture, religion or superstition" reveals that each year, millions of children suffer from harmful practices perpetrated by their parents, relatives, religious and community leaders and other adults. RESEARCH AND THESIS

INTERNATIONAL

According to our main activities and objectives, the International Juvenile Justice Observatory wants to give the opportunity to researchers and PhD activities and objectives. She also introduces us in the juvenile justice model and what kind of sanctions based in the community are imposed when a child is found guilty of an offence. She thinks that Ireland is moving in the right direction in youth justice and expresses here satisfaction because of the paper that here office has made in this matter, being one of the most important achievements the end of the use of adult prisons to detain 16 and 17 year old boys.
